Supreme Court Ruling Likely Will Limit Agency Actions on Safety and Health

The U.S. Supreme Court has overturned a 40-year precedent, commonly known as the Chevron deference, a ruling that some experts suggest will have a significant impact on how OSHA and other federal agencies regulate safety and health. Previously in the 1984 case, the Supreme Court ruled that courts should defer to a federal agency's interpretations of its own statutes... In the majority decision on Loper Bright Enterprises, et al, v. Raimondo issued June 28, 2024, six justices agreed that courts are the true decision-makers on resolving ambiguities in laws, such as the OSH Act of 1970.
